Vol. XXVI No. 6

February 2017

NEXT MEETING: February 2, 6:30PM

Dr. Jack Rasmussen will speak about the Maryland Arts Council

Message from the President, Patrick Sieg

Early each year we take stock of where we are and what we might want to do differently. We make “New Year’s Resolutions” and sometimes we even keep those resolutions. As artists we may resolve to create more works, visit more shows and museums, and to become more involved in the art community. Perhaps, and I hope this is true; we resolve to support and grow our Rockville Art League.

What we are really doing is making, accepting or resisting change.

And change is a really complicated thing. It makes all of us uncomfortable sometimes and some of us uncomfortable always.

But as artists I hope that you fall in the “uncomfortable sometimes” group because without change we are unlikely to improve or reach our full potential.

Luckily, we have seen much change in RAL in 2016.

- Nearly all of our board members are new this year and several who were on the board in the beginning have switched roles. These changes encouraged new ideas and fresh perspectives.

- We have welcomed photography as an art medium embraced by RAL.
- There are new opportunities for RAL to play a role in the arts in our community through outside shows, a strong relationship with the Glenview Mansion gallery and expanding membership in our league.

The above represent several big changes but there have been plenty of other changes as well, in the process we used to stage our member shows, in how we run our meetings and in the diverse and excellent speakers that have presented to us.

And I am much looking forward to trying new things this year. Hopefully, some of those will lead to lasting changes, improvements, in the way we operate.

But we will also be careful to embrace the many appreciated and successful aspects that have long been a part of RAL.

Resilience to change helps us navigate the complexities of life and I believe is essential to happiness. Change, to me, means adding, enhancing, looking for continuous improvement and building on prior successes. And it might also mean making a mistake now and again (and that is okay) and learning from those as well.

Special thanks and announcements...

- RAL members are showing at Brookside Garden. Carlos Garcia arranged the show details and several members contributed work and collaborated to hang the show. It has been a couple of years since RAL was on display at Brookside Gardens and the show is terrific. It runs until April 3 with new work being added on February 27 and much deserves your visit.
- Rob Gale has assumed the role of RAL Treasurer. We look forward to his help on finances and his overall contribution to RAL board decisions.
- Jae Shin and several RAL Board members came together on very short notice to fill a vacancy in boardrooms 5 and 6 at the Glenview Mansion Gallery. Their work augments the featured artists on display and runs through February 10. Please stop by to see this beautiful show.
- The Student Art Show is planned for mid-February and Emily Pearce has pulled together a dedicated cadre of volunteers to make it successful. She still has volunteer needs and your help is much appreciated.

Thank you and I look forward to seeing you and changing often in 2017.

Patrick Sieg
RAL President

Critique by Penny Kritt

Painting Skies

For an artist, there are few things that tell a more powerful story than the sky. Of course, it's a shape in a composition. But it's so much more, and your method of representing it will determine whether yours is fabulous or just typical.

Your choices show the time of day. Inform the viewer of whether it is sunrise or sunset, high noon or twilight. Is it that dead, dark time when our restless thoughts seem to always be anxious. Perhaps it's that moment when light breaks over the horizon and it's time to celebrate a happy event or finally realize the recovery from a terrible illness.

The sky also tells the weather conditions at that moment. Make that a big, important part of your narrative. Is it a sunny high noon on the beach – in the winter? Has a big rainstorm finally given way to the puddles that the toddler had to splash in? Is it a dreary summer day full of clouds the color of lint? Is it a daytime cyclone whose black clouds are slashed and split by lightning?

Have your sky something special that will cause a strong emotional response for the viewer. You can bring echoes of that one glorious early morning lying warm and happy with your lover. You might show the fearsome power of a tornado viewed by people safe in a storm cellar or the terror of sailors during a massive hurricane when one can only pray that fate will be kind.

For a sunny sky, at the top of composition, start with a lightened version of French ultramarine blue as in Figure 1 below. As the color moves downward, gradually change it toward a lighter, greener color like cerulean. On the left and center, the colors are used full strength. The far right side shows a light wash of transparent burnt orange that was added and it removes the "crayon color" for a more sophisticated look.

For anything from dreary overcast to stormy skies, use a combination of French ultramarine blue and burnt orange. If the ratio of blue is higher, you'll get a gun metal blue. Too much burnt orange will give you brown. There's a sweet spot in the middle that makes a perfect black. Lighten it and you'll have a neutral (not warm or cool) charcoal gray.

If you're going to show stormy skies, let the viewer know how long it will last! In Figure 2 below, the storm is raging, but we can see that it will be over soon.

Could you look at a photo and tell if the night sky was taken during the summer or the winter? And if you can, do you know why? See if you can describe the difference between the two skies shown below in Figure 4. Hopefully, your monitor is correctly calibrated so you can see a difference.

The upper section is the summer night sky. It's a blue with a lot of black, but it also has a significant amount of yellow so it takes on a slightly greenish cast when compared to the swatch below. The bottom section is also blue with black, but it has more red. I hope that gives you enough data so you can mix these colors from what's already on your palette. But if you want to buy them, generically, the summer sky is a generic Prussian blue or Daniel Smith's Mayan Dark Blue. For the winter sky, use Daniel Smith's Indanthrone Blue or a generic indanthrene blue.

Tip: To lighten skies – and to paint water in a landscape – go more transparent instead of just a flat, opaque blue! For watercolor, add gum Arabic or medium instead of water. For oils and acrylics, add a pearlescent white instead of opaque titanium white.

Especially if the sky is a big shape, don't let it be boring. There are many different kinds and shapes of clouds and lots of reasons to let them reflect any color you choose. Just remember, if the sun is above the clouds, their top edge will be hard and the bottom edge will be gradually softer. That will keep them from looking like you pasted them on.

And finally, there's probably no more famous sky than van Gogh's Starry Night. The swirling brushwork and layers of colors set a standard for innovation that has yet to be outdone. Let's quantify what makes this so special.

Starry Night

Oil on canvas/Vincent van Gogh

It's a summer sky on a clear night. And it's probably soon after sunset when the sky isn't completely dark, especially lower toward the horizon. The sky is alive with brush strokes instead of being a flat, boring shape. All the broken light around the stars implies how they shimmer.

Not every painting will have a technique this groundbreaking, but it's a lofty goal, pun intended.

Happy painting!
